Director's Note

It's truly remarkable what students can accomplish in just over a month. This cast held their first staging rehearsal on September 19, and in that short time, they've learned and memorized their roles while mastering an exceptionally complex scenic timeline.

Over these weeks, we've also had meaningful conversations about the heavier themes in this script, particularly the depictions of hanging and their racial implications within the context of our society in the United States. The students have approached this material with thoughtfulness, empathy, and dedication, showing up each day ready to work and to grow.

For many of our leading actors, this production marks their first-ever performance in a major role, which makes their achievements even more impressive. I couldn't be prouder of their commitment and artistry.

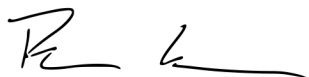

This production would not have been possible without the trust and collaboration of my colleagues. My heartfelt thanks to Sio for her exceptional musical leadership and for guiding the cast through challenging harmonies and shifting meters, and to Jamie and Anais for continually going above and beyond in their support of our students.

The Fabrics

I love incorporating fabrics into productions; they're incredibly versatile and evocative. With the right lighting and movement, fabric can become wind, water, fire, time, or even the very essence of space itself. In this production, you'll clearly see the fabrics used to represent water. But as the story shifts fluidly through time, we also use them to blur the boundaries of past, present, and future; allowing the narrative to flow between multiple realities at once.

And of course, there's one song in Act II that simply *demand*ed a dramatic boat moment, so we used the fabrics for that, too, because, well... it just looks really cool.

Enjoy the show!
